Tens of thousands of people from around the world came to the Panama-California Exposition in 1915 (and the Panama-California International Exposition in 1916) and many of them rode around Balboa Park in one of Clyde Osborn's Electriquettes while they were here.

The Electriquette, a two-passenger, battery-run electric car built for the event, had a body entirely made of wicker. They were one of the most popular attractions of the Panama-California Exposition in Balboa Park but after the event ended they disappeared. No one knows what happened to the originals and they are presumed destroyed.

Now the Electriquette is back! You can find out more about our project, which brought the Electriquette back to Balboa Park, at our website
